Beauty Salon

My mother couldn't afford to pay for therapy so she went to the beauty salon instead,
The hairdresser washed and untangled her anxiety away.
As a kid, I wanted to spin around on the styling chairs but I knew better

The latest merengue songs played on a loud speaker, Women gossiped about neighbors and telenovela actresses.

One girl asked for a short haircut and everyone gasped they tried to convince her to get layers instead but she didn't

I watched the hairdresser, Comb in hand, parting my mom's hair in different directions,
It seemed to me like she was making roads where all of moms' thoughts came together.
I watched her play double dutch with hair strands making braids appeared Wisdom dwelled on her fingertips

The styling chair was a confessional, and each haircut a new beginning.
